If you're looking for the new Facebook, look no further than Instagram. After showing annual growth of more than 900% two years in a row - rising from 1 million active users to more than 100 million active users, according to a collection of TOTEMS Instagram statistics - Instagram was actually acquired by Facebook in 2012 for $1 billion. And then it kept growing. As of December 2014, the social network has more than 200 million active users, with 20 billion shared images - an average of about 60 million images a day. That's a lot of sharing. The idea of Instagram is simple: users post photos taken in everyday life directly to the platform, using captions and hashtags to connect and share with other users. And while the reasons for growing an Instagram account are varied - some people want to make a living selling photography, while others simply want an easy way to share their lives with friends - it's easy to get lost in the sheer volume of photos uploaded online. Grow Instagram tips Following the question of whether you're hoping to become the next big Instagram star, or just want to develop a stronger social network with family and friends, use these tips to grow your Instagram follower. 1. Share interesting, relevant and beautiful photos If you scroll through your Instagram feed, you'll likely notice a trend of similar photos - maybe it's food, family photos or yoga posts. Take a moment to really look at them and point out which one you're attracted to and which one you find yourself scrolling into in the past. So ask yourself, why? Chances are you're attracted to telling a story. They're probably clear and simple, and offer something that's a little different from the basic image of a hand holding a Starbucks. Take high-quality photos first and foremost, it's important that your photos are of high quality. This means taking a moment to think about setting, lighting and background before filming. For example, if you're in a dark restaurant at lunch, try using natural light from the window to take a picture of your food, or wait until you're outside to take a photo with friends. Also, if you're taking pictures at home, beaver over your shoulder to see what's behind you before shooting - you don't want a laundry basket overflowing to add mess to the picture. You may also have meant that you've completely relinquished your smartphone camera and selected a standalone digital camera instead. For example, my smartphone takes great photos when I'm out in natural light, but there's something wrong with my phone's camera when I'm shooting inside - the lens gives all my photos a purple hue that I can't edit. If I want to take a picture inside, I take the picture with my DSLR camera, email it to myself and then upload it to Instagram from my phone. It's a three-whole process, which can be annoying, but it ensures high-quality images every time. Keep photos relevant before you post a photo, think about who you're trying to make it. Who's your congregation? If you're trying to grow a personal brand as frugal shoppers, you want to get track with other frugal shoppers, or with those who want to be a frugal shopper. As such, you may not want to document a shopping spree of several thousand dollars at a designer clothing store. You may also not want to post 10 photos a day of your cat. These types of images dilute your message. Of course your community would like to get to know you as a person, so it's okay to spread your feed with off-topic personal photos here and there, but it's a good idea to follow rule 80/20. Save 80% of your posts targeted to your overall message, with 20% on other topics. Make Interesting Pics I once asked a photographer how a fitness blogger could take more interesting social photos, and the first thing he said to me was, don't share aerial photos of your running shoes after or before running. He was referring to the trend in the fitness and running community - a trend that overreacted. In the end, his point was that you wanted to make your pictures stand out from what everyone else was doing. Given the sheer number of photos uploaded to Instagram every day, it's no small task. It's not like you have to reinvent the wheel completely - it's perfectly fine to post a picture of your Starbucks, you just have to think about how to make it a little different or weird. For example, if your waitress is wearing a Santa hat while handing you your mug, ask if you can take a photo while he or she hands it to you. Or if you're drinking coffee on the beach, buy a picture that focuses on the sunrise over the ocean. It's also a good idea to consider using video apps or Instagram to add interest to your photos. Android and iPhone versions of Instagram let you shoot video directly from the app, so instead of taking one photo of your family dinner, take a short video while you're all sitting down to eat. If you're not a video fan, consider taking a series of photos during the night, putting them together for a virtual photo flip after eating. I recently started using Flipagram (an app available on Android, iPhone, and Windows Phone) to put together short presentations - it works well and it makes your photos stand out from the audience. Finally, you don't have to post regular photos. There are many photo editing apps available that allow you to add text overlays, or simply create text-based images. InstaQuote is the one I use, which is compatible with iPhone and Android. Adding overlays of text or text is a great way to hit your message home. Not everyone will read your caption as they snide through their Instagram feed (it's all about photos, after all), but they'll likely read an overlay located above your photo. For example, you can place the Web address at the bottom of the image as a watermark, or you can highlight a specific hashtag that corresponds to the image. For example, I'm starting a campaign for Called pushing your limits, challenging your expectations with your #pybbye. Every photo I post applies to the campaign, I'll use an overlay of text to tag #pybbye. That way my followers will see the hashtag and be more likely to say, what is it? I'll stop and read the caption. 2. Interacting with the community as on all social networks, it is important to actually interact with the community in order to receive the following. Don't be shy about following other users' feeds. You can do this by heading your Options tab within Instagram, where you can choose to find friends, and then follow friends from Facebook or your email level. There is also an option to find those offered for you by Instagram. Choose the ones you're most interested in. In many cases, simple tracking will result in a continuation. After tracking other users, you'll travel the time to Want or comment on the photos they share. You don't have to spend hours of your day doing this. Just select a handful of photos you really like, and write a real note on the photo. As nice as it is to hear, a cool picture, try to go deeper. For example, you can ask a food blogger what brand of crackers he or she serves with a favorite dip, or you can ask a photographer which app he or she used to edit a photo. When you interact with others, they are more likely to interact with you. In many cases they will respond back, and may also give you a follow-up. And just as importantly, their followers are more likely to pay attention to your account, and if you've asked a question or posted a relevant or helpful comment, followers may simply follow your account as well. It's almost like erecting a row of dominoes - you drop one, and slowly but surely, a ripple effect occurs that ultimately comes down to more likes and follows. Another simple and effective way to interact with the community is to republish photos of other people. However, Instagram is not like Twitter, where it's very easy to retweet someone else's tweet. You should actually use a third-party app to republish photos. I use the Repost app, which pulls photos from the accounts you follow, allowing you to easily select the ones you want to repost. It automatically tags the original poster, credits it with the image, and also notifies the original poster that it has republished its content. Not only does it allow you to post great photos that other people have taken, but it shows the original poster that you value its or its content so that he or she is more likely to pay attention to you. You can play it to your advantage by finding influential Instagrammers in your every now and then republish. The key word here is occasionally. You don't want your feed to become mostly content produced by other people. If you start republishing, try sticking to a 3:1 ratio of your content to content from others. Here's how your feed will stay yours. 3. Use and search Instagram hashtags. Could be your best friend. Instagram's search is set to use hashtags, so by hashtagging your photos with relevant words or phrases, your photos are more likely to be found by those interested in your niche. So if you post a picture of your dog, you can use #dogsoftstagram hashtag to place your photo in the search feed for all photos with this hashtag. Popular hashtags can be found using Instagram tags to search by the most popular overall or most popular by category, such as makeup or music. Alternatively, you can use an app, such as Tagstagram, to copy and paste popular tags directly into your Instagram posts before you post them online. Besides using hashtags to be more searchable, you can also use hashtags to search for those interested in your client. For example, if you're a big fan of yoga, you can search for the hashtag #yoga find other yogis to connect with. This helps extend your reach beyond those you already know to the wider Instagram community. 4. Share frequently to gain more followers, you need to be active on Instagram. Your photos will only live on your followers' feeds for about four hours, so if you don't post on a regular basis, you're likely to be forgotten, and go to obscurity. The key is to publish frequently without publishing too much. The goal for 1 to 10 messages per day is applied during a full period of 8 to 12 hours. If you take 20 photos while on vacation at Disneyland and throw them into your feed at once, you're going to annoy your followers and get a follow-up. Instead, choose the top two or three photos you really like, and share them separately over the course of an all day. If you forgot to log into Instagram regularly, check out available scheduling apps for your smartphone. Now I use the free takeoff app, available on iPhone and Android, but you can also look into Latergramme for iPhone, or ScheduGram. While the apps themselves can't advertise on Instagram because of Instagram's API rules, they allow you to schedule your posts, including photos, comments and hashtags. The app sends you a reminder at the designated time to actually remember to do the advertising yourself. 5. Promote your account there is nothing wrong with a little self-promotion. Link your Instagram account to your Facebook and Twitter accounts so you can boost your recent Instagram posts to your other social networks. If you have a website or blog, be sure to include a social tracking link to your Instagram Page on your website, and consider incorporating Instagram galleries into some of your posts. These galleries can be specific to your own Instagram profile, or choose a specific hashtag. For example, when I start using a #pybbye, I plan to combine a gallery of tagged photos with the hashtag in blog posts about the campaign. SnapWidget is an easy and free way to create the HTML needed to add this type of gallery to your website or blog post. And don't forget, Okay to ask for followers. Email your contacts asking who else is on Instagram offering a mutually following arrangement, or remind your friends and followers on Facebook and Twitter that you have an account you want them to follow. You'd be surprised how willing people are to respond to such a simple request, especially if they're already following you elsewhere. The last word no matter what your reasons for having an account, keep it fun. Your followers and potential followers will know if this looks like a chore to you. But if you're really committed to raising your followers on Instagram, the most important thing is to stick to it and be patient. You can see significant growth here and there, but like any social platform, long-term consistency is what pays off. Are you on Instagram? How did you raise your next ones? Following?
